Metrolink becomes front-runner in sprint to Del Mar Racetrack

New Service to Del Mar

On Saturday, July 23, Metrolink began operating trains from Los Angeles Union Station to Del Mar Racetrack and back so you can enjoy rooting for your favorite horse as it competes in some of the biggest races of its life. And horse racing is not the only pastime offered at the racetrack this season. You can even wine and dine at Del Mar Racetrack’s new restaurant and bar. The special weekend train service, which we are offering in partnership with North County Transit District (NCTD), is available through September 4.

“This is an exciting opportunity for Metrolink to collaborate with other transit agencies like NCTD to offer our riders more options and also serve customers in new areas,” said Metrolink CEO John Fenton.

For a round-trip to and from Solana Beach, you must purchase our special $28 Del Mar/Solana Beach Ticket, which is offered at ticket vending machines at L.A. Union Station and stations along the Orange County and San Bernardino lines. Any other ticket type will not be accepted. Riders who live near the Oceanside Station can purchase their Del Mar/Solana Beach Ticket for a small special fee of $8 to get from Oceanside to Solana Beach. Free shuttle service* is offered by the British Bus Company from Solana Beach to Del Mar Racetrack for passengers who arrive at the Solana Beach Station.

Happy cheering!

Metrolink gives bicyclists a new reason to pop a wheelie

On July 30, Metrolink began operating “bicycle cars” on designated weekend trains at no additional charge to riders who commute on our Inland Empire-Orange County Line, our most popular line for bicycles during the summer. The move was made in response to growing rider demand for additional bicycle storage capacity.

“These specially designed cars, which are easily recognizable by the large yellow decals posted in the middle of them, will create a more user-friendly experience for bicyclists because we can accommodate more bikes,” said Ron Svoboda, Metrolink’s director of maintenance of equipment.

Metrolink added a car to our morning and afternoon beach trains because they experience the heaviest bicycle traffic during...

weekends. The bicycle bays are located on the lower level of the cars and have the capacity to hold up to 18 bicycles per car. The lower levels comply with ADA requirements and still have priority seating.

Metrolink designed and retrofit the cars in-house at a relatively low cost and also reached out to the bicycle community for its input. The special cars will be available through October 9. If the rollout proves successful, we will consider retrofitting more cars.

Customer safety reminders

ALWAYS use the handrail when boarding and leaving the train. Please watch your step.

ALWAYS hold the handrail when climbing or descending the stairs onboard the train or at the station.

ALWAYS use the seat handholds when standing or moving within the train car.

ALWAYS store your belongings under your seat or on your lap, not in the aisles.

ALWAYS strap your bicycle in the bicycle storage area. If space is not available, please move your bike to the adjacent car.

ALWAYS collect all of your belongings and move toward the exit as soon as your station stop is announced.

NEVER put your hands or any objects between closing doors.

ALWAYS remember that station stops are brief; please be ready to exit when the doors open.

ALWAYS wait behind the warning line while standing on the platform.

ALWAYS cross tracks at a designated crossing.

ALWAYS look both ways before crossing train tracks.

NEVER walk along the tracks or use the right of way as a short-cut. Trespassing on the railroad right of way is illegal and could result in a citation, monetary fine, serious injury or death.

NEVER cross the tracks when the signal indicates that a train is coming. Flashing lights and ringing bells mean STOP and wait for the train to pass.

NEVER walk under or around pedestrian gates.

Customer commentaries

Metrolink Matters will share feedback from you on what passengers are talking about out there on the rails. We will reprint quips from your letters and emails—and even your Twitter, Facebook and other social media comments...so keep 'em coming! Every mode of communication matters.

Customer Julie Ivey emailed:

1. The new cars have less leg room and narrower seats as well as less room to put rolling briefcases and backpacks, etc. As a result, very overweight passengers and those with commuter bags (not suitcases) end up taking up two seats—reducing the possible profit gained from sardining more people in. You don't have enough personnel to monitor the taking up of multiple seats—but then again, what is a passenger with a thick briefcase or large girth supposed to do? If you took out two rows (eight seats), passengers would be able to breathe—and contain their belongings within the increased leg room.

2. The backs and too-high headrests on the new cars have caused back and neck problems for those under 6 feet tall. The curve in the seat back makes it painful for short folks like me on long commutes to relax.

3. Why no overhead racks in the redesign??? More customers, and not bags, on the seats.

4. Overall, new cars are “unfriendly” and claustrophobic.

Metrolink responded:

We are sorry to hear that our Guardian Fleet cars are uncomfortable for you. The cars were strategically designed with safety in mind. For example, the seating configuration enhances the collision energy management (CEM) technology that the manufacturer, Hyundai Rotem, incorporated into the car structure. Modifications to the seating arrangements could compromise the effectiveness of the CEM and reduce the seating capacity of the car, which is not conducive to Metrolink’s safety goals or our ability to provide ample seating for our riders who crowd our trains during peak hours. In addition, the aim of the higher seat backs is to provide more neck and back support; the seat backs actually promote proper seating posture, which alleviates muscle tension and back stiffness caused by sitting improperly.

The new cars, like the other cars we operate, do not include luggage bins. Passengers have the ability to store their items under their seats. Although having amenities like overhead storage would be nice, Metrolink, unfortunately, does not have the budget to install them in our cars.

How riding Metrolink helped him function independently, forge lasting friendships

For many commuters, Metrolink is a means of transportation they count on to get to work or just a service they use to travel to leisure-time activities. But for Ken Hyder, riding the train is a learning tool and in essence his ticket to independence.

Hyder, who turned 39 on August 1, suffers from the rare genetic disorder Aicardi Syndrome. His corpus callosum, the structure that connects the right and left sides of his brain, did not develop normally, thus contributing to his inability to read, write and tell time, and difficulty engaging in conversations. In spite of that, he has successfully learned, through lots of trial and error, how to travel throughout the Metrolink system.

Hyder, who has ridden Metrolink trains for about 14 years, participates in a day program that helps people with developmental disabilities learn how to function in society. Part of his program entails riding the train, which stimulates his brain by forcing him to think on his toes. “Imagine standing in front of an oncoming car. One side of your brain knows that it’s dangerous, but it can’t tell the other side to move. Can you imagine how that feels? It’s very difficult to get communication through and across and back and forth. So him riding the train is really very amazing,” said Donna Hyder, his mother. “He succeeded because he wanted to do it, and he loves the trains,” she said.

And riding the train is not all Ken does. He helps elderly people get on and off the train, opens station doors for disabled passengers and people whose hands are full, and he even “enforces” Metrolink train policies such as asking people to remove their feet from the seats.

He also has helped Metrolink employees elevate their job performance. “Ken helped me to be a better steward for our passengers by recognizing that sometimes we need to slow down and take time to smell the flowers,” said customer engagement representative Tina Greer, who has known Hyder for eight years. “I realized that new riders come to the station and they don’t always get the train language, but when we as customer representatives take the time to explain and simplify it, it gives our new passengers the confidence to come back and try it on their own.”

Another benefit of Hyder riding the train is that he has formed strong bonds with other passengers, Metrolink employees and train crews, and station security personnel, among others. “I am lucky to have a friend like Ken who always surprises me with a flower waiting on my car window. It’s something that’s so simple, yet a kind act that always puts a smile on my face,” said Greer.

So the next time you board a Metrolink train, remember this: That great big piece of steel can mean more to someone’s life than just transporting them somewhere. It can be a symbol of hope, allowing people the freedom to learn by trying something new and at the same time scary, engage in social interactions and make lifelong friends.
